Hines' Lantana Media Campus Wins Sustainable Quality Award

City of Santa Monica to Honor Winners at May 4 Luncheon

5/3/2004

(SANTA MONICA, CA) – Lantana Media Campus, owned and managed by Hines, the international real estate firm, has swept all three award categories to become a winner of the 2004 Sustainable Quality Award. For the past eight years, the award, developed by the Santa Monica Chamber of Commerce's Environmental Affairs group, has recognized businesses that exhibit sustainable operating principles. Award categories are environmental, economic development and social responsibility. Winners were presented with a State of California certificate at the Santa Monica Festival on May 1. Winners will also be honored during a May 4 Chamber of Commerce luncheon at the Four Points Sheraton in Santa Monica.

A few of the many sustainable practices at Lantana Center are:

- Permeable Paving Pilot Program - case study involving the use of five different paving materials to help determine which materials perform best and reduce storm water run-off
- Parking lots designed without curbs to allow water to be absorbed into the soil rather than lost down storm drains
- Water Augmentation Study - pilot project to monitor the impact of storm water infiltration on groundwater quality
- Lighting retrofit that includes a self-contained motion-sensing lighting control for energy savings
- CO-sensors in the subterranean garage, reducing exhaust fan run-time and cutting electricity expenses
- Electric car charging stations
- Skylights and operable windows

Since Hines' purchase of Lantana in 1998, the firm has actively supported a myriad of social programs. Recent Hines community outreach projects include corporate sponsorship of local elementary school Edison Language Academy, a local job fair in conjunction with St. Anne's Catholic Church and support of various local art programs/groups. Lantana's extensive benefits, such as its Wellness Program and Personal Development Program, consistently exceed industry standards. Lantana Media Campus, a three-building, 330,000-square-foot complex, is home to many entertainment businesses, including the IMAX headquarters, Revolution Studios, Lawrence Gordon Productions and such shows as Crime & Punishment and Curb Your Enthusiasm.

Santa Monica: City Council okays two Lantana Media Campus projects

Hines, an international real estate firm, won unanimous Santa Monica City Council approval to build two new entertainment studios on the developer's eastside Lantana Media Campus.

The Tuesday, September 14th, vote will allow Hines to build the three-story, 64,105-square-foot Lantana East on Olympic Boulevard and the three-story, 130,000-square-foot Lantana South on Exposition Boulevard.

Lantana East will have a two-level, 378-space subterranean parking garage in addition to 55 surface parking spaces.

Lantana South has a one-level, 303-space subterranean parking garage plus 133 surface parking spaces.

"Upon looking at the environmental impact report and the wide range of benefits for this project, it is not a hard decision to support this agreement," said Councilmember Ken Genser.

The Lantana Media Campus is located on Olympic Boulevard and Exposition Boulevard between Stewart Street and Centinela Avenue.

Currently, the campus is headquarters for IMAX, Revolution Studios and Lawrence Gordon Productions

The television shows "Curb Your Enthusiasm" and "Crime & Punishment" are filmed on the site.

Lantana Media Campus consists of environmentally friendly buildings and won the 2004 Sustainable Quality Award from the Santa Monica Chamber of Commerce for its "green" buildings.

PUBLIC BENEFITS — The City of Santa Monica "negotiated" Lantana East and Lantana South development agreements with Hines to provide more than $2 million in traffic mitigation and public programs.

City staff recommended that Hines be obligated to provide separate lists of benefits associated with the construction of each building, whichever building is built first.

The City Council agreed to shift most of the public benefits onto Lantana South after Hines senior vice president Douglas Holte said a large cost associated with the smaller Lantana East could result in neither project being built.

"Lantana East should not bear the burden for Stewart Street Park and Edison Playground Partnership improvements," Holte said.

"It will be difficult to get financing for a project under a development agreement that is too expensive," he said.

[Hines is expecting to construct Lantana East first. The company, throughout five years, will:]

- contribute $80,000 per year up to $400,000 to the city to support childcare subsidies for low-income families;
- contribute $100,000 to fund art or cultural programs at Virginia Avenue Park;
- replace and upgrade the public restroom building in Stewart Street Park;
- fund playground improvements and operating costs for the city Edison Elementary School Playground Partnership program;
- construct sidewalks on Olympic Boulevard and Centinela Avenue; and
- fund neighborhood traffic plan improvements and follow-up traffic studies one year after each building is constructed.

“Something will eventually be built there. Let’s make this project happen at a level Hines can support so we get the childcare funds right now,” mayor pro tem Kevin McKeown said.

Suzanne Frick, city planning director, had recommended Hines pay $925,000 over five years for childcare subsidies.

[Hines also agreed to make commitments to train and hire Pico Neighborhood residents and at-risk youths and unemployed Santa Monica residents for construction jobs.]

SUNSET TRAFFIC — Several residents from Sunset Park, near but not directly adjacent to the Lantana Media Campus, wanted the City Council to reject the development agreements because those residents said the projects would cause more traffic congestion.

“We spent the last year and a half undertaking extensive analysis and review of potential options for neighborhood protection per City Council directive,” Holte said.

“Only one intersection, at Pico Boulevard and Centinela Avenue, will be significantly impacted after mitigation,” he said.

[Hines has had five meetings with the Pico Neighborhood Association, two meetings with Friends of Sunset Park and meetings with several surrounding facilities as part of the public review process.]

Holte said — and City Council members agreed — that entertainment industry employees do not keep 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. office hours and traffic problems have been mitigated as reasonably as possible.

McKeown said Hines is “the best developer for the site.”

The site is part of the Light Manufacturing and Studio District.

Lantana Expansion Approved, Residents Divided

By Susan Reines
Staff Writer

September 16 -- The City Council approved a major production studio expansion Tuesday night to mixed reaction from residents, who were divided over whether the hefty community benefits package the developers agreed to provide would compensate for extra traffic in the area.

The "development agreement" unanimously approved by the council requires developer Hines Lantana to pay over $2 million in traffic mitigation and donations to schools and City childcare in exchange for permission to add two new buildings to its Lantana Media Campus, which houses production studios for tenants such as Disney, Paramount, Warner Brothers and HBO.

Council members said they were generally satisfied with the final balance between traffic impacts in the residential areas near the City's industrial corridor, where the expansion will take place, and community benefits.

"Nobody can offer guarantees, but I believe upon looking at the EIR (Environmental Impact Report) and also weighing the potential for negative impacts, when that's compared to the wide range of benefits for this project, for me it's not a hard decision to support this agreement," said Council member Ken Genser.

"We can't purchase [the land] at this time for parks. Something will be built there," said Mayor Pro Tem Kevin McKeown. "So it's not that we're not aware of traffic problems."

McKeown and other council members suggested that, for neighbors, Lantana would be the best developer for the site because the project was environmentally friendly and traffic would be spread over the course of the day, since entertainment industry employees do not generally keep typical office hours.

Since the council denied Hines Lantana's request to expand its current facilities on Olympic Boulevard two years ago, the developers reduced the size of one of the proposed buildings by about 15 percent and worked extensively with residents of the adjacent Pico Neighborhood, gathering input on the benefits package and paying for the neighbors to hire their own traffic consultant.

Most of the residents at the meeting seemed to agree with the council that the millions of dollars in community benefits would compensate for traffic impacts of the seemingly inevitable development of the property.

Marcia Zimmer, resident of one of the closest streets to Lantana, said she initially opposed the project but "came around."

"Basically, I figure they're going to build something there sometime and these people (Lantana) at least are going to give some traffic mitigation measures and a lot of other benefits to the community," Zimmer said.

Still, a small number of residents who spoke at Tuesday's meeting lobbied the council to deny the 194,000-square-foot expansion, saying the neighborhood could not handle the approximately 1,800 car trips the new buildings would generate each day.

These speakers came primarily from the Sunset Park Neighborhood, which is near but not adjacent to Lantana, and so will not receive the traffic mitigations and other benefits granted to the Pico Neighborhood.

But the council members held that they could not address traffic concerns because the "prime" lot between Olympic and Exposition Boulevards would inevitably be developed either by Lantana or another developer.

None of the council members expressed fundamental objections to the expansion; their discussion focused on the size of the community benefits package the developer should provide.

At the urgings of Senior Hines Vice President Doug Holte that "it's in no one's best interest to have projects under a development agreement that will probably never be built because it's too expensive," the council accepted the benefits packaged offered by the developer even though City staff and the Planning Commission both recommended packages that would have cost hundreds of thousands more.

The final benefits package of over $2 million dollars includes traffic mitigation measures such as installation of medians, a follow-up traffic study a year after the larger of the two buildings opens, construction of new sidewalks along Olympic Boulevard, a "first-source" hiring program for neighborhood youth, improvements to the playground of the nearby Edison School, $100,000 for arts education and $400,000 to the City's childcare fund.

Planning Director Suzanne Frick said staff recommended a much larger childcare contribution of $925,000 based on calculations by a consultant who determined how many employees would be hired per square foot of development and how much those employees, in turn, would use the City's childcare services.

Holte said Hines Lantana's smaller offer of $400,000 was double the contribution required in even the "most progressive" cities. Berkeley and the few other cities that require childcare contributions charge at most $1 per square foot, Holte said, and Hines Lantana offered double that figure "on good faith."

Irene Zivi of the city's Early Childhood Education Task Force and other representatives of the childcare community said they were happy with Hines Lantana's $400,000 offer.

Council member Michael Feinstein said he agreed with City staff and the Planning Commission that the developer should pay more to the childcare fund, but the other council members seemed concerned that a larger sum would prohibit the projects, which Holte said are already "unfeasible" in the current economy, from ever becoming a reality.

"Let's make this project happen at a level (Hines Lantana) can support so the funds get to childcare now," McKeown said, adding that he did not want Lantana's level of contribution to set a precedent for other developers.
